- 5. Comment. A struggle to win the allegiance of the millions of Chinese abroad has been going on between Chian Kai-shek and the Peiping regime. Chiang could only make promises for the future. Peiping's decision to give the overseas Chinese representation in Parliament could have far-reaching results. To be sure, they appear problematical; because large numbers of overseas Chinese claim definite citizenship in their host lands and call themselves--in Malaya for example-the "King of England's Chinese." Only in countries like Malaya and Thailand, where the Chinese are discriminated against, will the Red Chinese scheme exert a counter force. The inclusion of overseas representatives in Parliament is significant from three points of view:
 - a. It makes it possible for the Peiping government to support the overseas Chinese indirectly, and directly through diplomatic representations, in which special rights will be demanded for the delegates of the Chinese colonies, and possibly Chinese diplomatic passports issued.
 - b. In this way Peiping will be in a position to avert a covert political or propagandistic influence.
 - c. Parliamentary representation for overseas Chinese is the beginning of a Greater Asia five-year program proceeding from Peiping, which will run until 1958, to create a compact political, economic and racial system.
